How to stay warm when out in the cold

(complete with stuff that works and where to get it!)
The most important thing is to keep dry. Wet skin or clothing conducts heat away from your body at an alarming rate. This can be difficult to maintain when climbing hills or striding along like a pendulum, causing perspiration to soak into your previously insulating clothing. This is where layering and zippers come into play. You need to anticipate how hard you will be working (playing!) and before you become wet, ventilate (unzip) or remove layers.

Dress warm, but don't overdress!

Layers and types of clothing;

You have probably heard many times that cotton is a bad choice for winter clothing because cotton absorbs water but then holds onto it. None of your clothing choice should be cotton, or you will have cold and clammy clothes. My preference is for Coolmax fabric, Smartwool, or anything that Sporthill makes (especially 3SP). (there are plenty more that work equally well). These are often called technical fabrics because they do not like water on the molecular level and wick it away from the skin, drawing it to the surface of the cloth where it can evaporate or be passed onto the next layer.

I have seen Coolmax/cotton blends, but suggest you avoid them. They take much longer to dry than the pure synthetic fabrics and seem colder.

A word about Gore-Tex; Although I like Gore-Tex (and copies), it does not breathe anywhere near well enough to deal with XC ski style exertion.

How to stay warm when out in the cold (continued from page 1):

A word about colors: given a choice, I go for a bright color that is easily seen by skiers, snowmobile drivers, or potential rescuers. If you ski where hunting occurs, this becomes even more important. It would be just plain silly for a skier to want to wear camo fabric.

The first layer of clothing is probably the most important. It should be relatively thin and be somewhat snug to the skin (to prevent cold air from getting in and to wick sweat away). It does not have to be tight, just not loose.

Here are specific recommendations based on what I use. I am a stop and go touring skier, perspire a lot, so things need to breathe very well.

First Layer:

Top: Sporthill ,Zone 2 (32-65 degrees) ,Top, long sleeve, wicking (Nomad or similar model)

Underwear/briefs: wicking, non-cotton www.sierratradingpost.com usually has some at good prices. www.rei.com also carries several types. I have found that with the XC Pants (see Second Layer), a special wind panel is not needed.

Bottom: If cold, wicking long underwear. Lightweight tights work well. I found heavy long johns to be much too warm in any reasonable weather (used with XC pants).

Second Layer:

Top: Sporthill Zone 3 (0 to 40 degrees) The Summit model has 3SP in the front and lighter fabric in the back. If it is 30 degrees or warmer this is all you will need for a top.

Bottom: Sporthill Zone 3, XC pants. These are made completely from 3SP, have wind resistance to 30 mph, dry quick and are very warm. I find I do not need tights or long underwear until it gets below 17 degrees or so.

Third Layer:

When it gets really cold, or you stop playing hard for a while, you need something extra. A jacket such as Sporthill Journey or Symmetry are a couple choices. They breathe extremely well and are wind resistant.

<http://sporthill.com/productsall.php> tops, pants, jackets, hats

www.sierratradingpost.com gloves, underwear, hats, socks

www.rei.com underwear, socks,

The Extremities The cold spots of our bodies

Hats: This is an easy way to control temperature, and if you get cold ears is a must have. I found that most hats collect way too much perspiration. What works for me is a Sporthill beanie (the Swift fabric version, the 3SP fabric one would be too warm!). It does get wet, but never soaked, and does not feel clammy. Stops wind nicely also. <http://sporthill.com/product.php?TypeID=3870&gender=u>

Shoes/Boots: The really old boots pretty much did not have insulation. Newer boots all have Thinsulate or something similar. Most are waterproof which means that foot perspiration (feet have lots of sweat glands!) can build up in a couple of hours. If you do not do something special (like use a boot drier or a fan) it is likely that they will still be damp the next day and your feet will get cold. If a boot is tight on your foot, you will impede circulation and crush some insulating air space, so you will be colder. Make sure you get a good fit. DryGuy Drystix is a gentle heated boot dryer. http://www.dryguy.net/PRD_DG3.htm

Snowshack sells them and more goodies;

<http://www.snowshack.com/brand/dryguy>

Boots generally come with poor footbeds. For more insulation and comfort replace or add a footbed such as Superfeet (has good arch support)(available in most sports stores) or 2 oz Miracle which is a foamy self molding footbed (great insulation!) (available at Walgreens, Target, etc) .

<http://www.feetrelief.com/feetrelief/superfeet.htm> footbeds

Socks: The best system is a thin liner sock (Coolmax or other wicking fabric) and a heavier oversock. The thin sock clings to the foot which prevents rubbing and blisters as well as grabbing moisture very effectively. The thicker sock further removes moisture and insulates.

Liner Sock: any thin Coolmax type fabric. Do not use cotton/Coolmax blends. Russell Athletic Dri-Power socks are more reasonably priced than most. Sportsmans Guide and Amazon sell these.

Over Sock: I use LL Bean fleece socks as my oversock. A single mid-weight sock is ok if that is all that fits in your boot. For colder weather (below 15 degrees) the special Techspun sock system works very well. Note that they are a quite heavy sock and the "Extreme Weather" sock is a very heavy sock, so make sure you have room in your boots.

I also use Smartwool socks. They do not itch and can be laundered with conventional fabrics.

If you are going to be out for more than a couple hours, a change of socks is a very good idea, at a minimum, a change of the liner sock.

www.techspun.com cold weather sock system

Gloves:

Glove Liners: This is another area where a liner helps a lot. I find that no gloves have worked for me and I must use mittens, even at the warmer temperatures (30 degrees is warm?). My favorite liner is a thin Smartwool glove (#11-552), but for colder weather I move up to the thicker Techspun glove <http://www.techspun.com/gloves.html> (these don't seem to be currently listed on the Techspun order form, so you may need to call). The Smartwool Cozy Glove #12-454 looks like it might be a good substitute if the Techspun is not available. In mild weather I have found that even a very thin liner helps, such as a silk glove. These are available at <http://www.sportsmansguide.com/net/cb/guide-gear-china-silk-clothing-.aspx?a=40252>

In the past I have tried aluminized "space gloves" (these are thin liners) which claim to reflect heat back into the body. They did not work that well.

Gloves/Mittens: The bigger the better works here. I use a pair of Gordini mittens (Men's Challenge XII Mitten available at www.altrec.com). These have Primaloft insulation (unlike down, works when wet) and Gore-Tex to keep outside moisture from soaking the glove. Since the Gore-Tex does not let the glove breathe enough, they get damp inside after a while. It is important to dry them out each day, so you have dry gloves the next day. If you hang them up, make sure they hang open; even so they may take two days to dry. A faster way to dry them is to use a forced air dryer. I use a Dry Guy forced air blower (with a tube that goes into the glove) or a plain old room fan blowing across the glove.

Wash those gloves every once in a while, perspiration builds up salt, causes chapping.

I have also tried ragg wool heavy mittens with terry liners. They breathe pretty well, but can pick up snow, which melts and makes them wet. <http://www.vermontcountrystore.com> www.techspun.com socks, liners, maybe gloves www.sportsmansuide.com silk gloves, etc.

WWW.sierratradingpost.com gloves, socks

<http://www.vermontcountrystore.com> ragg wool

Important: When washing/drying wicking fabrics, do not use fabric softener (it coats the fabric and prevents it from wicking). Many wicking fabrics do not tolerate heat well and may want cold water wash and line dry. I hang dry all mine just because it is more gentle. 3SP fabric most definitely needs special treatment.

I have bought a lot of my gear at end of season sales, both locally and on-line. Prices tend to be ½ off. www.snowshack.com has especially good end of season deals.

XC Ski Hints and tips:

- 1) Lay gloves, hats, socks, etc on the dashboard defrost vents for a quick dry between skis.
- 2) The road down to Harriet Hollister has been newly paved! Even the dirt road at the last mile is now flat.
- 3) Bend the knees down as low as you can for those bumpy downhill and turns. The lower center and other stuff really make it a lot easier! Give it a try!
- 4) Chapped hands? Try TopCare Fragrance Free Hand Cream from Wegmans. How did they get chapped? Maybe your gloves need washing! Perspiration builds up salt fast.
- 5) Make sure you are using your pole straps correctly. You should be able to push with the strap applying pressure to the top of your hand and barely having to grip the pole.
